According to Robert Parry at Consortiumnews.com: The first sign of the terror attack came less than a month later. On April 4, 2001, at 10:59 p.m. EDT (8:59 p.m. ET), two suicide bombers wearing ski masks blew themselves up in front of reporters at a news conference, killing two employees of the Washington Post and wounding 21 at the New York Times building. In a subsequent news conference that night, President Bush claimed that Saddam Hussein planned to conduct a second attack on U.S. facilities. A few hours later, a second bomb exploded in a restaurant on the south side of Washington, killing 21 people.. All the words of each day are the same. They are the same as each of the thousand years before that. The same as this day.

A number of factors influence the level of oxidative stress in the central nervous system in animal models of stress-induced brain injury. Oxidative stress has been demonstrated to play a key role in the pathophysiology of acute and chronic neurodegeneration. Oxidative stress and inflammation (inflammation and oxidative stress) both play crucial roles in the pathophysiology of stroke and glial dysregulation, as well as in the pathophysiology of other neurodegenerative conditions. In particular, chronic inflammation can cause neurological diseases as well as the pathophysiological causes of a variety of neurologic disorders such as Alzheimer's disease. Chronic inflammation also induces brain tumors and autoimmune diseases, as well as inactivation of various immune systems. Both chronic and acute inflammation can lead to an overproduction of reactive oxygen species (ROS) and, to a lesser extent, mitochondrial ROS such as PDE9. In addition, oxidative metabolic pathways and oxidative stress can cause damage to brain tissues, such as cerebral endothelial cells (CEs) and neuronal cells such as astrocytes. Oxidative damage to neurons can promote a process called excitotoxicity, which leads to neurodegeneration. Furthermore, in some cases, brain changes can lead to neuronal cell death, both in the adult and in the fetal period due to a prolonged accumulation of reactive oxygen species in the cerebrospinal fluid. Recently, a number of groups published in the peer-reviewed scientific literature have proposed that oxidative stress is involved in. .
